INTRODUCTION

CHOICE appreciates the opportunity to provide the following comments on the Australian Energy Regulator's (AER) Position Paper on the Default Market Offer Price (Position Paper).¹ CHOICE has been calling for the introduction of a safe default offer that is:

- affordable, with a capped price
- available to everyone in a deregulated market
- free from excessive marketing costs
- a safety net when a customer has not chosen an energy offer, their previous contract has expired

CHOICE's support for safe defaults is echoed by 4,896 CHOICE supporters who have written to Energy Minister Angus Taylor to call for fair, affordable, and accessible default offers.

CHOICE welcomes this consultation as the first step towards implementing effective safe default offers across the National Energy Market (NEM). CHOICE is supportive of the abolishment of standing offers and the introduction of a new default offer, but has a number of concerns around the proposed design of the default offer price.

In this submission, CHOICE will restrict commentary to default offers offered to residential customers, and will not comment on electricity offers for businesses.

Recommendations

1. That the AER ensures that every electricity provider is required to provide a default offer. These offers must be used by retailers in circumstances where a standing offer is currently used and in circumstances where a customer has proactively asked to be placed on a standing offer.
2. That the AER ensure that the price determination process is driven by clear, consumer-centric outcomes. Specifically, the design of the default offer should be fair and affordable and lead to significant reductions on consumers' energy bills.
3. That the AER should exclude customer acquisition and retention costs (CARC) from the calculation of default offer.

- If the AER does include retail margin and CARC in the calculation of the default offer price, these costs must be capped.
4. That the AER should, in the long-term, take a cost-based bottom-up approach to determining default offer prices.
 - However, CHOICE is supportive of the default offer being implemented in as efficient a timeframe as possible and recognises this may require utilising the top-down approach for a brief establishment period.
 5. That the Federal Government introduces legislation to grant the AER information gathering powers in order to ensure that the regulator can undertake a bottom-up information gathering process effectively.
 6. That when selecting tariff types to which the default market offer will apply, the AER takes an approach that makes the default offer accessible to as many households as possible. The regulator should give greater consideration to developing a default offer that is available for time of use tariffs, in addition to the suggested flat-rate and controlled-load tariffs to suit customers with smart meters installed.
 7. That the AER ensure that the default price will also deliver fair outcomes to households who use solar.
 8. That in addition to the annual review of default offer prices, the AER schedules a three-year review of the default offer determination process to ensure that it is facilitating the delivery of fair and affordable electricity.
 - As part of this review, the AER should assess whether the tariff types to which default offer prices will apply are suited to consumer needs.
 9. That the AER undertakes additional consumer comprehension testing to determine how a dollar amount on a reference bill is displayed to help customers compare and contrast offers effectively.
 10. That the Federal Government grants the AER powers to develop rules that prevent retailers from keeping customers on 'evergreen' market contracts.

A need for affordable energy offers

The energy market is not working for consumers, who are struggling to navigate a sea of complex energy offers to find an energy deal that meets their needs and their budget. Of the households with the lowest 20 per cent of incomes, one in four are now paying over 8.8 per cent of their income on energy, up from 7.6 per cent a decade ago.²

Expensive energy bills mean that families forgo health and comfort in order to pay for their electricity. 30.2 per cent of low income households in NSW don't use hot water for bathing in an attempt to reduce their energy usage, and nine per cent regularly go without a substantial daily meal for themselves as a result of energy bills.³ These figures show that urgent reform is required to deliver fair and affordable electricity prices to consumers. If implemented correctly, safe default electricity offers have the potential to deliver affordable access to this essential service.

The cost of energy has long been a key concern for households and continues to rank ahead of any other household expenditure concerns in CHOICE's quarterly Consumer Pulse Survey.⁴ A separate CHOICE survey found that although 63 per cent of respondents felt that they were paying too much for energy, only 41 per cent felt they had sufficient information and tools available to find what's best for their household when it came to energy.⁵

In deregulated markets like the NEM, consumers are rewarded for engaging: those who compare and contrast energy offers can save money by switching to more competitive energy deals. There is however a sizeable portion of consumers who cannot actively engage in the energy market and will not be able to compare offers and switch. This can be due to factors such as language barriers, time constraints, behavioural biases, or these consumers may simply be overwhelmed by the complexity of the energy market. In late November, there were 2227 electricity offers available to residential customers in NSW, making the task of selecting the best offer without assistance almost impossible.⁶ Discounts further complicate consumers' experiences in the NEM and make it extremely difficult to compare offers because the size and conditions of discounts vary greatly.

Behavioural insights research suggests that the complexity of the energy market can lead to 'information overload, which, for some consumers, can occur even if they are assessing a seemingly manageable amount of information, as they may fail to discern which information is important or ignore some of it altogether.'⁷ Knowing this, it is crucial to ensure that consumers who cannot engage with the energy market still have access to affordable energy, and are protected from retailers' predatory practices.

The Australian Energy Market Commission (AEMC)'s 2018 Retail Competition Review found that a representative residential customer moving from a median standing offer to the cheapest market offer can, per year, save $832 in South Australia, $574 in Victoria, $504 in South East Queensland, $365 in New South Wales, and $273 in the Australian Capital Territory.⁸ It is clear that disengaged consumers are overpaying for access to an essential service when they remain on standing offers. The proportion of customers on standing offers varies between states. ACCC data suggests that approximately seven per cent of households in Victoria, 11 per cent in South Australia, 18 per cent in New South Wales and 19 per cent in South East Queensland are on standing offers.⁹

Standing offers were designed to function as a safety net to ensure that all consumers can access electricity services. Standing offers were set up with a view that consumers could shop around for a more competitive market offer if they chose to do so, but would be protected by standing offers if they did not exercise this choice.¹⁰ In their current form, these offers are failing to protect consumers who are not engaged in the energy market.

The industry-held view that standing offers should be the most expensive offers on the market¹¹ undermines the purpose of these offers, and penalises consumers who do not, or cannot, choose a market energy offer. This punitive view places a burden on disengaged consumers and does not provide adequate protection for consumers in a complex energy market. Safe default offers are needed to provide safe, low-cost defaults to protect consumers who don't, or cannot engage from high energy prices. These offers are also necessary to protect consumers who cannot access market offers due to poor credit history, and must resort to using standing offers to access electricity. Safe defaults must be available to everyone in a deregulated market, whether they choose to access these offers voluntarily or 'default' onto them in circumstances where they have not made a choice to sign up to a market offer.

When proposing this policy, the ACCC estimated that in real terms, moving average residential customers from current standing offers to the new default offer could result in annual savings of between $500 and $750.¹² The AER's determination of the price of the default offer must ensure that households moved from standing offers to safe default offers must see significant reductions on their energy bills.

Recommendations 1 and 2

1. That the AER ensures that every electricity provider is required to provide a default offer. These offers must be used by retailers in circumstances where a standing offer is currently used and in circumstances where a customer has proactively asked to be placed on a standing offer.
2. That the AER ensure that the price determination process is driven by clear, consumer-centric outcomes. Specifically, the design of the default offer should be fair and affordable and lead to significant reductions on consumers' energy bills.

Setting the price of default energy offers

CHOICE acknowledges that in a competitive market, where the differences in product offerings are largely limited to price, environmental impact, customer service and retailer reputation, offering a default product at the lowest price in the market may have the impact of inhibiting competition. We support the default offer price being calculated based on 'the operating costs of an efficient retailer...', and believe that a default offer determined in this way will not inhibit competition. Retailers will still be able to offer competitive market offers above or below the default offer price, but they will no longer be able to easily exploit disengaged consumers. The design of the default offer must first and foremost be driven by the goal of improving consumer outcomes. The default offer must allow customers in the NEM to access fair and affordable electricity, and must come with the highest levels of consumer protections including access to paper bills and bill smoothing.

CHOICE's first preference is that 'a reasonable retail margin and customer acquisition and retention costs' (CARC), is not included in the default offer price. The default offer is not designed to be a compelling, competitive market product, but rather, it is an offer that is meant to act as a safety net for a small portion of disengaged consumers. Retailers should therefore not need to allocate marketing spend to a product that is not designed as a competitive offer. While CHOICE's first preference is that CARC costs are excluded from the calculation of default offer, if the AER does include retail margin and CARC in the calculation of the default offer price, CHOICE recommends placing caps on these costs.

The definition of ‘reasonable retail margin’ and ‘customer acquisition and retention costs’ must be clearly defined in order to set clear caps that will guarantee the affordability of default offers. The recommendation to ‘include a reasonable margin as well as customer acquisition and retention costs’ runs the risk of being exploited by industry.¹³ CHOICE would like to draw attention to the fact that consumers are on average paying a retail margin that is more than double what it was 10 years ago in dollar terms.¹⁴ Excessive retailer margins are contributing to expensive energy bills that consumers are struggling to pay, and the default offer should not enable the continuation of this practice.

CHOICE is also concerned that the calculation of the default market offer is over-reliant on existing market prices, both with regard to standing and market offers. Consumers are overpaying for energy across the board: data from CHOICE’s energy switching service, Transformer, has shown that Transformer customers can save an average of over $600 on their energy bill by switching to a more affordable market offer.¹⁵ Basing the default offer price on the prices that retailers have set themselves without undertaking detailed analysis of retailers’ efficient operating costs is less than ideal, and does not take into account high retail margins. This would mean that the default offer would be calculated using data gathered from a broken energy market that is not delivering value for consumers. Calculating a default offer by using data on inflated energy offers is not a suitable approach in the long-term for determining fair and affordable energy offers.

CHOICE recommends that the AER take a cost-based bottom-up approach to determining default offer prices. This would allow for the AER to estimate the main cost components of a bill in order to determine a default price. The AER’s proposed top-down approach would set a range for default offer prices by assessing observed market prices and identifying both the median market offer (to determine the lower limit) and the median standing offer (to determine the upper limit). This range is representative of a market that is not delivering good outcomes for consumers and relies on market participants’ own expectations about the efficient costs of providing electricity services in particular distribution zones. A bottom-up approach is a more suitable method for determining the efficient costs that a retailer would incur in a confusing market with enormous price dispersion between electricity offers.

CHOICE acknowledges that the AER faces a number of constraints that may limit them from performing a comprehensive bottom-up analysis before the implementation of the default offer in 2019. If a top-down approach is used to determine the first iteration of the default offer, the AER must begin work to ensure that a bottom-up analysis can be implemented as soon as is possible. Until a bottom-up approach is implemented, a top-down approach has the potential to deliver improvements for consumers who are currently on standing offer contracts.

To ensure that the AER can undertake this approach effectively, CHOICE recommends that the Federal Government introduces legislation to grant the AER information gathering powers in order to ensure that the regulator can undertake this process effectively.

Recommendations 3, 4, and 5

3. That the AER should exclude customer acquisition and retention costs (CARC) from the calculation of default offer.
 - If the AER does include retail margin and CARC in the calculation of the default offer price, these costs must be capped.
4. That the AER should, in the long-term, take a cost-based bottom-up approach to determining default offer prices.
 - However, CHOICE is supportive of the default offer being implemented in as efficient a timeframe as possible and recognises this may require utilising the top-down approach for a brief establishment period.
5. That the Federal Government introduces legislation to grant the AER information gathering powers in order to ensure that the regulator can undertake a bottom-up information gathering process effectively.

Ensuring that the benefits of the default offer are realised

The introduction of safe defaults has the potential to deliver more affordable energy for households. CHOICE recommends that when selecting tariff types to which the default market offer will apply, that the AER takes an approach that makes the default offer accessible to as many households as possible. The regulator should give greater consideration to developing a default offer that is available for time of use tariffs, in addition to the suggested flat-rate and controlled-load tariffs to suit customers with smart meters installed. The AER must also ensure that the default price will also deliver fair outcomes to households who use solar.

CHOICE supports an annual review of default offer prices, which should include forecast changes in input costs for the coming year. CHOICE recommends that in addition to the annual review of default offer prices, the AER schedules a three-year review of the default offer determination process to ensure that it is facilitating the delivery of fair and affordable electricity. As part of this review, the AER should assess whether the tariff types to which default offer prices will apply are suited to consumer needs.

The AER has requested input on how default offer prices should be specified. This is an opportunity to develop communications that are easily understood by consumers. CHOICE notes that while consumers are used to receiving quarterly electricity bills, consumers typically see noticeable variation between energy bills in the warmer and cooler months. Given this, CHOICE is supportive of an annual bill estimate being determined for each distribution zone. This follows the ACCC's recommendations for the AER to 'publish a reference bill amount for each distribution zone using AER bill benchmarks for medium (2–3 person) households and the price set by the AER for default offers.'¹⁶ These reference bills will play a key role in helping consumers compare offers, and retailers will have to use these reference amounts to calculate advertised discounts. CHOICE is supportive of the use of an annual dollar amount to be used in the presentation of a reference bill, but suggests that additional consumer comprehension testing is undertaken to determine how this amount should be explained to customers to help them compare and contrast offers effectively.

CHOICE also recommends that the Federal Government grants the AER powers to develop rules that prevent retailers from keeping customers on 'evergreen' market contracts. Many market contracts continue indefinitely beyond the point at which a customer's benefits have expired. There is currently no requirement to switch these customers to a safe default, so they will remain on an overpriced market contract until they make an active choice to switch. A mechanism needs to be developed to switch these customers to safe default offers in order to prevent them from being penalised for not engaging with the energy market. CHOICE acknowledges that recent changes have been made to ensure that customers are notified when their benefits expire, but we stress that education alone is not enough. Retailers must be required to switch customers to safe default offers to prevent households from being exploited through nefarious 'bait and switch' behaviour.
